When one of either party is killed, a separation takes place, succeeded by another course of recrimination, after which explanations are made, the affair terminates, and hostility is at an end; the two parties meet amicably, bury the dead, and join in the corroboratory dance. When the United States Exploring Squadron was anchored in Sydney Harbour in December one of the expedition's artists, Joseph Drayton transcribed and later published four "Australian native chants", claiming to have taken them from live performances, all by the same "native", including a "new song" that he was taking back to his tribe. The whole document is fully searchable.

Despite his emphasis on purely aurai association in v. And, as is generally the case. On the first line, there is an identifying number, after which each song is identified by a title, either the one provided by the original author or transcriber; or, where none is given, an appropriate word or phrase from the author's or transcriber's text or name; or else another description is supplied editorially.
