See Chapter 6 Economic Development – Section 6. They provide an alternative to one-off housing in the countryside through the consolidation of rural residential development within existing small clusters. It is acknowledged that certain kinds of rural enterprises, especially those that involve natural resources and serve rural communities, at an appropriate scale, has a major role to play in rural development into the future.

The ubiquity of the Irish one-off housing phenomenon, therefore, unlike asr
The very high public cost of haphazard development patterns also has a parallel negative impact on our urban centres through the inefficient diversion of public funds. As discussed by Nix some expensive services are essentially rural. The provision by the state of serviced sites is not a new idea. According to the
