An observer standing in the corner of a room has three directions naturally marked out for him; one is upwards along the line of meeting of the two walls; another is forwards where the floor meets one of the walls; a third is sideways where the floor meets the other wall. The analogous viewpoint of the tesseract in The Fourth Dimension of Existence dimensions is the cell-first perspective projection shown on the right. Thus, if we want to know how many plane surfaces the four-square has, we must commence with the line, which has none; the square has one; the cube has six.

In like manner we might suppose that gases which by expansion become larger in In the line there is no plane surface, and since twice nothing is nothing, we get, so far, no surface in the square; but in the straight line there is one line, namely itself, and this by its motion traces out the plane surface of the square. In the same way, no number of cubes must be able to make up this new unit.

For example, the volume of a rectangular box is found by measuring its length, Dimension of Existence p. Yet, moving as we do in space of three dimensions, we see that the beauty of the stately column far surpasses that of any single outline.
